made by each side, but none was agreed to.

The government has not as yet passed to patent the lands included in the project. The government usually waits to take this action after the water supply has been closely inspected to determine whether or not it is adequate. The settlers consider this question of so much importance they have made application to the department of the interior requesting that the water supply be not passed upon until they have been given an opportunity to be heard. They expect to prove that the supply is not adequate and thereby hold up patent until the state sees that the contract it has with the irrigation company has been gombied with.

State Engineer Robinson investigated the project and reported on it. He decisted that the big Jerome reservoir should be abandoned because it was not in condition to hold water and could not be made to do so.

The company insists that in view of the fact it has expended several hundreds of thousands of dollars on the project, a great injustice would be done if its contract should be forfeited.
